
Only one box remained in the sorting centre.
That's strange.
How strange?
According to the list, I've already delivered this.
I don't think the box agrees.
DING!

There were three parcels like this. Each held a part for tonight's festive lantern.
I've already taken the other two to the new addresses.
New addresses?
Parcel Centre
CHANGE! The parcels are going somewhere new. Follow this map!
That sounds quite official.
Let's check who sent it first.
Writing Pancake Centre on myself won't make lunch appear.
Confirmed. You have no pancakes.

The original form had different addresses and a familiar phone number.
Have the addresses changed?
We haven't changed anything.
I tried a new route planner this morning. Could the test message have been sent?
It was. I see it now.
CLATTER!
Luckily, I remember where I left those two boxes.

They found the first parcel at the bakery.
Who ordered a glowing moon with twenty sacks of flour?
The second had ended up at the bike repair shop.
Finally, a part even I don't know where to put.
RECALCULATING.
Thanks, we've sorted it out.

The moon, the star and the brass bell were in place.
DING...
Was that there before?
I count the parcels. I'll leave the mysteries to you.

All right. But first, let's see if there's anything left from the bakery.
I prepared for that possibility.
